ENCLOSURE 2PROCEDURES

1. HUMANE SLAUGHTER OVERVIEW. Domestic or wild animals procured and slaughtered for consumption are subject to antemortem and postmortem inspection in accordance with Reference (e). Animals used for survival training are exempt from such inspections. Training units and procurement activities should strive for purchasing the healthiest animals available. Animals exhibiting signs of injury or disease should be rejected by the accountable individual during the procurement process and not be accepted for use in training. Slaughter of animals for survival training will comply with Sections 1901 through 1907 of Reference (f) and Reference (g), when applicable, and the following procedural guidance.

2. HUMANE SLAUGHTER PLAN. Survival training programs using animals will follow a documented plan that addresses: the program of instruction; the location where the humane slaughter will be performed; the justification for the use of animals; the species of animal to be used; the number of animals to be used and an explanation or justification for the number of animals; student ratio; the training (i.e., basic qualifications, training, credentials, knowledge level), and oversight of personnel authorized to conduct slaughter; and the techniques that may be used for slaughter of each species. Training must be specific to the method and species being used and must be documented. Further, the plan will document the name and contact information of consulting veterinarian(s) and consulting public health/preventive medicine personnel, and will address the control of photography/videography and the social media rules for all participants. Records will be maintained in accordance with applicable component or agency guidelines.

3. MEDICAL CONSULTATION. The overall goal of humane slaughter is to minimize or eliminate animal pain or distress prior to loss of consciousness. Therefore, a DoD uniformed or federal civilian veterinarian must be consulted when developing the humane slaughter plan. The consulting veterinarian should apply professional judgment and knowledge of the species used to ensure the best outcome for the animal. When feasible, the consulting veterinarian will recommend slaughter techniques based on Section 1902 of Reference (f) or Reference (g). To ensure public health concerns are properly addressed when preparing the animal for consumption, the local military public health or preventive medicine unit must be consulted for additional guidance to the humane slaughter plan in regards to proper handling and preparation techniques, personal hygiene, and cross contamination.

4. MINIMIZING USE OF ANIMALS. DoD Programs will use the minimum number of animals necessary to meet survival training objectives and must maximize use of each animal.

5. CARCASS DISPOSAL. Carcass disposal will comply with Federal, State, local, installation, and/or host nation laws and regulations, as applicable.

6. PROCUREMENT OF ANIMALS. All animal procurement subject to this DHA-PI, whether domesticated, wild, or game animals, must be conducted in accordance with Federal, State, local, installation, and/or host nation laws and regulations, as applicable.
